

Stukhtra: A web platform intended to collate and display the personal and professional design work of Anna Malmquist.

Stukhtra.com (final site name to be determined) will showcase a range of design work and printed media created by Anna Malmquist, emphasizing the versatile array of skills from work done in a variety of different mediums. The site will act as a supplementary tool for personal networking, focused on displaying the breadth of current portfolio work and allowing additional works to be easily added in the future. As the site is not intended as a primary tool of networking, the site function should be focused around the visual display and clear coherent groupings of portfolio work into easily navigable categories.

Eric is a potential future employer working for a mid-sized game design company and is in charge of recruiting new talent for current and future projects. He is interested in learning about the credentials and body of work of potential employees to determine hireability.

Amanda is a business contact/potential future coworker; she is interested in getting to know the design style and workflow processes of her future coworkers so that upcoming team based projects develop smoothly.

Alexa is a potential client for commission work; she is interested in hiring freelance talent for personal art commissions and is researching the portfolios of artists to get a feel for a desired style, scope, and price range.

★ Comps: comparable sites allow for pagination and tagged groupings of specific types of works, along with an interactive sidebar menu for clear navigation.
